

Job Fairs

Contributed by Michael Jones
Friday, 15 September 2006

Do you know what you want to be when you grow up? This is a question burning on the minds of many high school and college graduates. It's often so difficult to know what career path you want to choose. How can you truly know it's the right one for you? Well, the sad reality is, a lot of times you can't. This is why God invented job fairs. Okay, maybe it wasn't God exactly, but some smart individual came up with the concept. Decent job fairs can be rather beneficial in helping you decide what field you really wish to pursue. It's time to take a hold of your future in the workforce. It's time to get hip with the concept of job fairs.

The first time I ever experienced a job fair was in college. It was at Portland State University and the crowds of students were swarming. What was the big fuss I wondered? Well, it turned out there was a decent sized job fair right smack dab in the middle of my campus. This was a perfect opportunity to test the waters. I began strolling around from table to table, striking up conversations with the people who possibly held my future in their hands. Well, you know what I mean. Maybe someone there would have the answer for my future career. I certainly knew that I didn't at that point. After speaking with a variety of representatives in different fields, I did have a better take on future employment options. I suddenly had a good understanding of things I didn't want to do, and a few things I would consider. Job fairs like these are great for giving you a dose of the real world.

Are you pondering your future after high school? Well, if you're just at this point, I wouldn't fret too heavily about careers. Instead you should seriously consider what school is right for you. A college education will definitely better prepare you for the workforce with skills and knowledge. You want that extra advantage before you attempt to vie with the many. Now if you're finishing up college and still have not decided on what you want to do with your life, it may be time to check out some local job fairs. It's true that even upon getting our bachelor's that many of us still haven't chosen a career path. Hop online today and find out what job fairs are coming to your area. The Internet makes it easy. Get a better take on your future with job fairs.